Somehow there is a link between these two. But I think it is like this: people with high IQ tend to develop an INTJ personality, instead of people with INTJ personality are smarter.

There are many reasons, for example, they are always misunderstood by others people because they are smarter when they are kids, they tend to develop an introvert personality, slowly they prefer reading books at home more than playing outside with other kids. Lack of inter-personal skills etc.

Kids with high IQ, if they were encouraged enough to perform a lot of activities and succeeded when they were small,...\(more\)

This is a plausible story, but I am not sure that it matches the facts. While the Myers Brigg...

I would like to point out that the majority of viewpoints expressed towards the INTJ type on this very page show a real distain or assumption of felt superiority on the part of the INTJs themselves. It's also a popular meme. This in itself is a labeling but instead of looking at traits from a positive point of view it seems that INTJs are often assumed to be self serving or even worse lacking the ability to consider their own recent life experiences which may color an answer chosen.

I note this as important because I just happen to test as an INTJ but with some middle-of-the-road tendencies ...\(more\)

Both the Myers-Brigg Type Indicator (MBTI) test and the IQ test are quite controversial. The Myers-Brigg test is particular seems to have little or no scientific validity. This is because it is not particularly reliable: it can produce highly variable results from one day to the next, for the same person. I suspect that most personality tests are only marginally more accurate than zodiac signs.

So INTJ is not even likely to be correlated with itself over time, let alone with anything else! :)
